About the Project

India faces major challenges on water availability with rising & competing water demand amongst agriculture, domestic and industrial sectors. While industrial water demand has increased in India industrial water productivity remains low. Government of India in its National Water Mission (NWM) has proposed optimization of water use efficiency as a goal. There is a significant need and opportunity to not only minimize the industrial water consumption but also to identify the best practices and benchmarks that could be assistive tool for various industries for enhancing their water use efficiency.

TERI undertook a study sponsored by Department for International Development (DFID) on enhancing water use efficiency in selected Indian industrial sectors. The study looked into the water use and management practices of selected water intensive industries to identify avenues/best practices for improved water use efficiencies and develop potential benchmarks with policy recommendations.

The project has been successfully completed and this workshop is planned to disseminate its key findings and seek inputs from the sector experts and stakeholders. It is our hope that these findings would provide useful insights to relevant stakeholders, industries and policy makers in India in achieving the common goal of enhancing the industrial water use efficiency in India.
